Most developments plant a few trees and call it green living. Bosco di Santa María did something else entirely — they cultivated a private forest, then built a residence worthy of it. This isn't nature as backdrop. It's nature as architecture. The canopy, the shade, the living textures surrounding every corner of Bosco were intentionally grown, shaped, and placed to create something Panama has never seen before: a home where the forest isn't outside your window — it's the reason the building exists. At 160 m², three bedrooms, three and a half bathrooms, and two parking spaces, this is Bosco at its absolute peak. A residence that doesn't ask you to compromise on a single thing — space, silence, and refinement delivered in full. The kind of home that earns its price not through spectacle, but through the quiet certainty that nothing here was done halfway. Every amenity within Bosco was designed to extend that forest feeling: lagoon pools that mirror the canopy above, outdoor cinemas under open sky, yoga decks nestled in green, co-working gardens where the
